The people became tired of this futile by-play, and signified their disapprobation by loud cries of: At him, Frascuelo! Give it to him; we want to go home. This made the espada slightly nervous, and he made a thrust when not fully prepared, only slightly wounding the bull, which charged upon and knocked him down, but passed completely over him in the impetus of his rush. He returned at once to gore him, and I certainly thought my quondam adversary was about to receive his last reward; but the capeadores were upon the bull immediately, and succeeded in diverting his attention until the man had scrambled to his feet. This was humiliating, and there was a look in Frascuelo s face that told...
