Nothing of this kind is found on ancient British coins; it is a warlike type, the device of a people still in arms against the invader, and the coins are the currency of Gallia while yet unfettered. If coins with the type of the androcephalous horse were often found in Britain we might claim for our primitive ancestors a mintage of their own previous to the Roman invasion. It has been urged, by those who would establish for these British coins a higher antiquity, that they are formed on the Greek model; but they appear to overlook an important fact, that many consular coins are convex and concave, and exceedingly dissimilar in fabric and style to the Roman money after the reign of Augustus, many of whose coins are evidently formed on the Greek model, and are the work of Greek artists. If we...
